ROMANCE IN REAL LIFE.
Novelists are credited with evolving from their inner consciousness extraordinary incidents in the lives of the characters of their books—incidents that are believed to be impossible ones. Sometimes they picture a man faithful to his first vows of fidelity and affection, and many people who read such scoff at it as too absurd for credence. Man is generally considered to be a creature of ephemeral passions. And perhaps justly so too. But there are brilliant exceptions to this generality. An exceptional instance is the case of a certain Welshman who was for some years resident in Ballarat, and here realised a competency. Nearly half a century ago in Wales he, then a collier, and another, an overseer in the same colliery, became enamoured of one young woman living in their neighbourhood. They both sought her hand, and she bestowed it upon the one that was the better off—the overseer—much to the sorrow of the other. The overseer with his wife, left Wales and came to Australia. Their wedded life lasted 15 years, when the husband died, leaving his widow with a family of 10 children. These she reared as well as she could, and in about 19 years she had them all comfortably settled, but her means were exhausted, and she lived with one or other of her married children, as they made her welcome. One day, walking in Sturt-street, some 34 years after the time she was married, she encountered the man who, then simple collier, had been a candidate for her hand. He was now an old man, had been fortunate, and was well to do. Though neither had heard of or from the other for 34 years, their recognition was mutual. He, in a kindly, grave way, inquired after her husband, her family, and her fortunes. On hearing them he told her that he had remained single because he had never cared for another woman. In a few days, having made inquiries which resulted in his finding that the lady was anything but well off, he renewed his suit, offering her the love she had formerly refused, and a comfortable, if not luxurious home. He was accepted, the marriage was soon celebrated, and the two settled down in a neighbouring colony. Just at present the widow is again in Ballarat, her faithful lover and most kindly husband having died a few years after he married his first and only love. This brief epitome of their pretty but pathetic history (says the Ballarat Courier) has the rare merit (for such narratives) of truthfulness.—Melbourne Age.
